American League baseball has already American League baseball has already been handed a black eye and is going to suffer a heap more next season and in years to come if a stop is not put to the practice of selling strong players by weak clubs to pennant contenders, when the race begins to tighten up.

In the National League we see a grand, old free-for-all scrap, with half a dozen clubs still elegible for the pennant. The pennant fight in the American League is not a sporting venture any more, it's a case of commercialism.

The one team which really needs star players if the present spirit of commercialism is to be continued is the New York Yankees, for a pennant contender in New York would make money for every club owner in the American League, and yet we do not hear of the Yanks getting a chance to bid for such players as Jackson, Jack Barry, Frank Baker, Bill James, and others who have been transferred for a consideration from second division American League clubs second division American League
